A space that is open

We have reduced the number of individual offices to a minimum and increased to 16 the number of conference rooms and team work cabins. The newsroom now has many more open spaces as well as natural light.

A photograph of a modern newsroom control room, viewed through a glass partition. The room is filled with white desks, multiple computer monitors, and several people working. The lighting is bright and even. The text is overlaid on the center of the image.

A space that is structured

The core of the newsroom is the Control and Distribution Desk, which is set up as a command centre and from which the production and distribution of content to the various platforms is organized. Both the physical and the virtual work environments have been specifically designed.

A space that is technological

The changes in the workflow are visually reinforced with a spectacular area of screens in the heart of the newsroom that allows monitoring the performance of the EL PAÍS products, with a special focus on mobile consumption, search trends, and social conversation. The video set is also located in this area.

A space that is global

This new technological space provides a 24-hour image of the work produced by the American and Brazilian editions, while the Central Control Desk includes a permanent representative from those editions across the Atlantic.

A space that is dynamic

Depending on circumstances, the layout of the working space can be modified. There is a meeting zone, a library and drawing-boards to boost creativity and team-work.
